

I am writing about Sinclair Broadcasting.

Back when I was in college getting my communications degree, we studied the development of broadcast law, the theory of the "finite spectrum" and the reasons behind the regulation of broadcasting. It made sense. The airwaves are a public resource and are not "owned" by any person or corporation. I realize that the Fairness Doctrine no longer applies as law, but in principal, does it carry no weight? Isn't fairness the most American of traits?

Instead of worrying about whose nipple might be briefly seen. why not do the job that you have been charged with?

The FCC must be above partisanship.
